CORK TREES IN CALIFORNIA. It Is Believed That They Can Be Grown

There in Large Numbers.

The available forests of cork trees are already relatively extensive, although hardly sufficient to supply the demands now made on them or which as the world grows in prosperity must be made on them, for there is hardly any end to the uses for cork, and none of the substitutes for it which have yet been tried are very satisfactory or extent. The latest estimates of existing areas of available cork oak forests make their extent from 3,300,000 to 3,500,000 acres, of which about onehalf, including those on its African possessions, belongs to France. The wood of the cork oak is heavy, coarse grained and of a yellow brown color; it shrinks and warps badly in seasoning and decays rapidly when exposed to the action of the atmosphere. It has little value in the arts, but furnishes a useful fuel and makes good charcoal. The inner bark is rich in tannin, and trees too old or unfit to produce cork are cut for the sake of the inner bark.

The cork oak is an interesting tree to Americans, as its cultivation now seems destined to become an important industry in California, where the climate and the soil in many parts of the state are admirably suited to produce it. This is not a mere theory, as trees have been growing now for several years in California, and have already produced crops of cork of excellent quality. It is probable that the tree will grow rather more rapidly in California than it does in its native country, aithough the quality of the soil, the exposure in which the trees are placed, local climate and the treatment which the trees receive will influence. of course, the rapidity with which the bark is developed.

In Africa it is found that the trees which grow the most rapidly produce bark of the poorest quality, and that within certain limits the slower the trees grow the more valuable the prodnet, provided the growth is not too slow, in which case the bark loses some of the elasticity which makes it valuable. The conditions which influence Mich., the development of cork are so numerous and complicated that the product of all the trees in a grove or forest can never attain the same uniformity of to be to go over the forest every two or three years and remove the bark from such trees as are covered with mer-

The planting and care of such forests in Portugal and Spain have long been an important industry, and there is no reason why they may not be made so in California, where the local consumption of cork is already enormous, al though the wine industry there is hardly more than in its infancy.-Garden
